Riya & Sameer had known nothing but deep love for each other, the kind of love people wrote poems about. 12 years after a fateful night, Riya is living her life in a small town in Maine. For 12 years she has been picking up the pieces of her life that Sameer had broken and tucking them in the deepest corners of her heart. Her life revolves around a set routine that she has come to love. In an unguarded moment of her disciplined life, everything she had carefully tucked away explodes.

To what extent will she let the explosion affect her life? Does a span of 12 years change the deepest feelings as it changes the person? Does the heart succumb to those moments you have lived in your mind countless times in the hope of them happening someday?
